III, Leo J. Daugherty : Train Wreckers and Ghost Killers: Allied Marines in the Korean War (Marines in the Korean War Commemorative Series) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Train Wreckers and Ghost Killers: Allied Marines in the Korean War (Marines in the Korean War Commemorative Series):

“Train Wreckers and Ghost Killers” discusses the contributions the British Marines and the Korean Marines made to the Allied Forces in the Korean War. In praise of the British Royal Marines that had been attached to his command since mid-November 1950, Major General Oliver P. Smith, Commanding General, 1st Marine Division, wrote that their services in the recently concluded Chosin Reservoir campaign made “a significant contribution to the holding of Hagaru, which was vital to the [1st Marine] Division.” General Smith’s comments reflected the view held by many Marines, both officers and enlisted, of the fighting abilities of both their British cousins and their Republic of Korea Marine Corps allies. During the three years they fought together on the Korean peninsula, the British, Korean, and U.S. Marines forged bonds that still exist today.
